Stories of Dwelling and Belonging among the Urban Poor

It is a great honour and a privilege to be invited to deliver the Ambedkar Memorial Lecture this year.<sup>1</sup> My interactions in the last few days with the honourable Vice Chancellor, Professor Shyam Menon, and the faculty and students of Ambedkar University have been stimulating. Inspired not only by Ambedkar's contributions to our thinking on citizenship but also encouraged by his obvious irritation with setting up idols in the name of thinking, I am emboldened to offer a view of citizenship that privileges not the august halls in which Constitutions are made but rather the slums and squatter colonies in which constitutional provisions are animated through the labours of the poor. Even if Ambedkar, the law maker, might have issues with what I have to say, I feel that Ambedkar, the child, who could not turn on the tap in school even if he was dying of thirst, would agree that much is at stake in thinking of citizenship through the lives of the urban poor.

How might one then constitute the domain of politics in the lives of the poor? An obvious genealogy for tracing this question runs from Walter Benjamin (1978) and Hannah Arendt (1977) to Giorgio Agamben (1998) and settles on, what Didier Fassin (2009, 2010) calls, the politics of life. For these authors, as Fassin notes, the notion of life splits the human into two domains – that of physical and biological life that man has in common with animals, and of political life that separates man from animals and gives him a unique place in the scheme of things. But does society offer the same possibilities for engaging in politics to all sections? What about women, the poor, and the dispossessed? Although there are important differences in the theoretical positions of these three authors, there is a general line of thought that postulates that the power of the exception invested in the sovereign can strip the lives of those living in abject conditions (such as in Nazi camps or in refugee camps) to “bare life” that can be taken away by the mere will of the sovereign. In a related argument, it is asserted that the struggle for survival robs the poor of the capacity to engage in any deliberative form of politics and reduces the realm of politics to a sentimental humanitarianism. Arendt, for instance, argues that the historical example of the French Revolution shows the limits of the participation of the poor in the processes of politics. She attributes the “failure” of the French Revolution to the poor who came in their multitudes onto the streets – making their plight public but also bringing the force of biological necessity into the realm of politics and ultimately “dooming” the Revolution itself. There is a second version of this story in which the leaders, out of pity for the driven poor (mixed with rage over hypocritical institutions), doomed the revolution by reducing “politics to nature” (Pitkin 1998: 231). For Arendt, issues pertaining to poverty belong not to the realm of politics but rather to the household or the administrative wings of government, and when these issues enter the realm of politics, it ceases to be the free deliberation between equal citizens devoted to ensuring freedom.

Although Partha Chatterjee (2004) does not take direct issue with Arendt, his intervention on the politics of the governed is an attempt to think of politics and citizenship through a different theoretical lens. Chatterjee makes a distinction between “civil society” and “political society” to gesture toward the fact that the politics of what he calls “the governed” is honed from the ground and makes use of whatever resources are available to secure goods necessary to preserve biological life. Yet, Chatterjee contends that what the poor engage in is politics, and not simply, appeals to pity or use of traditional patron-client relations. Much as I appreciate Chatterjee’s work to restore politics to the poor, he tends to work with binaries of those who govern and the governed; legal and illegal; governmentally produced population and moral community; civil society and political society; whereas, my attempt is to show that these concepts bleed into each other and produce the capacity to make claims on the State as a way of claiming citizenship. I too, then, come back to the politics of life, but rather than splitting life into the biological and the political, I argue that it is their mutual absorption that comes to inform the notion of rights in the sense of haq<sup>2</sup> (Cavell 1988, Das 2007, Fassin 2010).

Notions of Law, Life, and Exception

There are three concepts that this lecture puts into a dynamic, moving relationship – those of life, law and exception. I begin with a brief exposition of each concept and then argue – through an ethnography of struggles over securing a dwelling among a group of urban poor in a squatter colony on the periphery of Delhi, India – that it is the force that each of these concepts exerts on the others that comes to define the conditions of possibility for the emergence of claims over citizenship for the urban poor. In suggesting that citizenship is a claim rather than a status, that one either has or does not have, I hope to show the precariousness, as well as, the promise for the poor of “belonging” to a polity.

In a conceptual essay that appears in their influential book, Law and Everyday Life, Austin Sarat and Thomas R. Kearns (1995) usefully summarize the various ways in which legal scholars have looked at the relation between law and society. They divide these scholars into two dominant traditions: first, those who work with an instrumental understanding of the law and second, those who think of law as constitutive of social relations. The authors argue that though both kinds of scholars are interested in understanding the relation between law and society, one puts the weight on law’s capacity to regulate social relations (instrumentalist view), while the other is interested in tracking the traces left by law on social relations (constitutive view). As Sarat and Kearns point out, the instrumentalist view of law is interested in law’s effectiveness – the extent to which law is observed or not. This has inevitably led to an emphasis on certain kinds of legal objects, viz., rules, while ignoring other objects such as the symbolic performances by which the majesty or distance of law from everyday life is represented. The instrumentalist view is committed to a strict division between legal rules, and customs and habits, since law is distinguished in this view from other rules and norms operative in society by virtue of the fact that the former derive their authority from the State while the source of the latter are smaller groups in a society. Law in this picture is seen as a residual category whose role is episodic, artificial and often disruptive.

On the constitutive side, law is not experienced as episodic or artificial – it is not simply a set of rules that impinges on us from the outside. Rather, the most stunning example of law's constitutive power is to shape social relations in a way that its own traces are erased in the very process of creating persons as legal subjects. Social actors, in this view, internalize the images, meanings, and even artifacts of law such that they appear as normal and natural. I am interested in the manner in which the notion of rights is now evoked among the urban poor many of whom think that the State has promised them certain rights and that they have the standing (haq) to claim these rights. But where does the promise of the State to enhance life – as in quality of life or the good life – come from?

Foucault (2003) famously argued that the emergence of the bio-political State in a long transformation from the eighteenth to the nineteenth century marked a new understanding of the idea of life as it came to be seen as an entity to be managed by the State. Rabinow (2006) usefully summarizes the movement from bio-power to bio-politics in Foucault as he shows how the two poles of bio-power – that of the anatomo-politics of the human body and that of the regulatory controls over population – came to be conjoined in the nineteenth century. A politics of “bio” emerged so that life as a political object was turned back against the controls exercised over it in the name of claims over right to life, to one's body and to health. According to this view, biopolitics, as distinct from bio-power, refers not only to the regulatory power of the State as reflected in law, but must include truth discourses, strategies of intervention on collective existence in the name of life and health, and finally modes of subjectivation by which individuals are made to work upon themselves in subtle ways that make such pursuits as the desirability of preserving health a part of the common sense of the time (see also Rabinow 1992, Cohen 2004, Rose 2007).

In this picture of life, law is explicit and visible as a mode of regulation in such acts as that of passing health legislation, but it can also be discerned through its faint traces in the practices of other institutions such as the clinic and the school. It is striking to me that the concept of life at play in these theories is unambiguously that of biological life. I am suggesting instead, an idea of life, as in “forms of life”, in which the social and the natural absorb each other – forms referring to the dimension of social conventions and institutions, for example, and life to that which always inheres in forms even as it goes beyond them. Though we might recognize and name something as law when the context makes it stand out (e.g. in a law court or in a legal document), we need to put that particular moment of recognition within the flux in which notions of life and notions of law unnoticeably and continually pass from one to another. This is the flux we might name as the everyday.

Till this point my argument is that attention to everyday life (rather than life defined only as biological life) can help us to see that the boundaries between the instrumental and constitutive views of law – law as that which impinges from the outside and law that not only constitutes the social world by its power to name but also draws from everyday concepts embedded in life – are neither stable nor impermeable. Many scholars have drawn attention to the fact that legal norms exist within the wider fields of normativity that structure everyday relations (Unger 1986). Thus, for instance, ideas of legal obligation draw from our more diffused understandings of what it is to promise (Cavell 1979); the standards of reasonableness that courts apply depend upon everyday understanding of what is reasonable, what is normal, and what is excessive. I want to go further and argue that it is not only particular normative concepts but also what is seen to constitute our understandings of life itself – life of the individual as lived in relation to others, life in a community – that inform the claims that people come to make on law. This is a somewhat different conception of life than biological life though it does not exclude biological life; rather, it represents the manner in which the natural and the social mutually absorb each other. As an example of such absorption, take Carolyn Walker Bynum’s (1991) argument that what may appear to be “bizarre” legal cases regarding the future preservation of bodies in courts of law, may be better understood if we related them to medieval Judeo-Christian concerns on the consequences of mutilating bodies or mixing body parts in the light of the certainty of resurrection. I would add that this notion of resurrection belongs to a history of the “natural” in that it speaks to the way in which life, death and resurrection are constituted as “natural” events within a form of life that might have now disappeared. Practices of law are then not necessarily found in spaces, objects and rules that can be identified unambiguously as belonging to the domain of law such as courtrooms and legal documents. We may observe the force of the law in legal contracts but we might also track it in the everyday practices of promising – so, we can see how the affective force that particular legal concepts acquire may be traced to the notion of life, not only as a social construct or an entity to be managed by the State, but also in the insistence by inhabitants living in illegal shanty settlements that they have a moral standing to call upon the State.

I turn now to the third concept – that of a state of exception since it is here that the relation between life and law stands out again and becomes visible.

Exception

One of the most important theoreticians on the state of exception, Giorgio Agamben (1998, 2005), argues that it is not only that sovereignty and exception are contiguous as established by Carl Schmitt (1992) but also that this contiguity is essential for understanding the relation between law and life. As Agamben sees it, law comes to deploy the notion of exception not simply as a matter of political expediency, but as a juridical figure as the means by which the living being as a legal subject is brought within the purview of law – both bound by the law and abandoned by it. In his earlier work on homo sacer, Agamben (1998) had proposed the Roman figure of man as one who could be killed but not sacrificed, to propose that such a figure made it possible to judicially recreate life as “bare life” – mere biological life from which all signs of the social had been stripped. The later book on the state of exception allowed him to think of contemporary politics itself as a kind of necropolitics in which modern forms of sovereignty are about the taking of life without being held responsible for it. In this formulation, it is clear that law’s relation to life is defined primarily by the capacity of the sovereign to take life arbitrarily; once the legal subject comes to be defined as homo sacer, his death can neither be assimilated to sacrificial death that would carry the potential to nourish the community, nor can the sovereign be held responsible for such deaths since as the one who is the source of law, the sovereign has the right to declare what constitutes an exception. I will not rehearse here the criticisms of the mode of reasoning or the expansion of the idea of homo sacer to cover the wide variety of situations that Agamben brings under its purview (from the father’s right to kill his son to the mechanized killings of the Nazi camps). What interests me is that when life comes under the purview of law in this formulation of the state of exception, it must do so after being stripped of its social dimensions, as “bare life”. I concede that Agamben might be describing one face of sovereignty and that it provides a powerful way of thinking about some particularly grievous scenes of violence, though I regret the use of this trope for the widely dispersed examples he gives. Here, though, I wish to draw attention to another way of thinking about states of emergency and the relation between law and life for its potential to make visible an alternate tradition of conceptualizing the notion of a rule and its suspension.

I have in mind the notion of apaddharma – or the rules to be followed in times of distress as propagated by Manu, the Hindu lawgiver. I am proposing the idea of apaddharma as an alternative theoretical formulation to that of Agamben, not as a culturalist argument to plead for the exceptionalism of India, though the issue of how certain figures of the past might continue to throw their shadow on the present even when the forms of life within which they were embedded have receded, poses theoretical challenges of the sort that many anthropologists struggle with.<sup>3</sup> It is not my intention to obscure the strong hierarchical elements in Manu, nor indeed, am I unaware of the irony of evoking Manu in a lecture named after Ambedkar, but it seems to me that the ironist in Ambedkar might have appreciated the strange paths that intellectual trajectories can take.

As we know, Manu himself lived in times of apad or distress as foreign chiefs were establishing power over different regions in India when he formulated the laws by which everyday life was to be conducted.<sup>4</sup> The crucial question in the case of apaddharma is what kind of rule is to be followed during times of distress, such as a famine or a war, in which normal rules have been suspended (Davis 2006). Apad also seems to refer to an infringement so grave that the social order is itself put into question, as are cases of the murder of a Brahmin or a man sleeping with his preceptor's wife. Thus, the issues on which Manu records how one is to deal with suspension of normal rules are varied, but they seem to pertain to an imagination of what acts become permissible when biological life is threatened on the one hand, and on the other hand, how the social order is to be restored when an act seriously violates the idea of dharma, not as caste specific 'rules' but as violating the sense of life itself. An example of the former is the norms about the food that is permissible during famines, and that of the latter is the penance prescribed for major sins such as violating the bed of the guru (the spiritual preceptor).<sup>5</sup> Rules determining appropriate action during times of distress pertained primarily to the Brahmin and the king – the two central figures that Manu is interested in, and there is no question that most of the accommodations he permits re-inscribe the powers of these two figures. However, there are other concerns such as that of naming the new castes resulting from intermixture of established castes or determining what occupations might be pursued by various caste groups. The particular verse that I find quite compelling for our discussion on the general reflection on rules is verse 29, Chapter XI. According to G. Buhler’s translation, it reads as follows:

“By the Visve-devas, by the Sadhyas, and by the great sages of the Brahmana (caste), who were afraid of perishing in times of distress, a substitute was made of the (principal) rule.”<sup>6</sup>

We can get a sense of what a substitute rule means from the sequence of penances prescribed for someone who has committed the terrible sin of sleeping with his guru’s wife or has committed incest such as having intercourse with a sister. The sequence moves from the most severe penance leading to death of the offender to the less severe ones prescribing temporary exile to the forest. While the general notion of dharma has received much attention in scholarly literature, the fact that the declaration of a rule is usually accompanied by a discussion of an alternate, or the exceptions under which the rule could be set aside or substituted by another, deserves more sustained discussion. The notion of a rule explicitly brought forth the notion of exception and formulation of a substitute as if following the rule and setting it aside were joined together in imagination. Far from the sovereign being the one who could suspend the law through his power to declare an exception – the king himself was bound to use one of the substitute rules regarding his own conduct, as well as his obligations to his subjects when times of distress made it impossible to follow the normal rules by which such obligations were to be fulfilled. In the process of my fieldwork I would often find that if a rule was formulated – regardless of whether it was a priest pronouncing it or a local bureaucrat or a school principle – one common response of the person to whom the rule was to be applied was to ask how she or he could be freed from the orbit of that rule “iska koi upay to batlaiye.” While we could literally translate this as “please show me a way out” that would miss the point that an appeal is being made to expert knowledge through which a substitute rule can be formulated. Thus, the issue that seems philosophically important is to ask what it is to obey a rule and not simply, what is the content of the rule?<sup>7</sup> Manu’s passage that the gods themselves sanction such “substitute rules” shows that states of emergency in which life of both the individual and the community is to be preserved, allow a new set of rules to be formulated rather than a simple suspension of laws that would lead to a state in which one is reduced to “bare life”. It is the way that notions of life and law move in and out of each other that forms the texture of moral claims.

Moral Claims

Let me appeal to the most quotidian of examples to illustrate my point about citizenship as a moral claim that allows us to observe the traces of law in spaces that are not recognized as legal or juridical. The inhabitants in the cluster of shanties, which I will describe, are from the sprawling locality of NOIDA on the outskirts of Delhi. They are migrants from the states of Uttar Pradesh and Bihar, who came in different waves to these areas as new economic opportunities became available. The name NOIDA is an abbreviated form of Naveen (New) Okhla Industrial Development Authority – it refers to a sprawling new township that traces its official birth to 17 April 1976 when it was set up as part of the National Capital Region during the National Emergency (1975-1976). The administration was later taken over by the Uttar Pradesh (U.P.) government as migration increased. According to the 2001 census the current population of NOIDA is 290,000 and it is primarily composed of migrants from other cities as well as rural migrants. The official descriptions of the township boast of a high literacy rate (80%), as well as the existence of major educational institutions and a hospital in every residential sector. Yet, nestling in between these affluent zones are the clusters of jhuggi-jhopdi colonies, some of whose residents have been living there for more than 40 years.<sup>8</sup>

As with many other squatter settlements, the rural poor, who came here first as a trickle in the late sixties and then in waves since then, started by putting up shanties on unoccupied government land. The local expressions for such acts are jagah gher lena (to enclose a space) and the land itself is referred to as kabze ki zameen (land that was occupied). Although people did not have legal title to the land they occupied, mutual recognition within the community led to the notion that the land rightfully belongs to those who settled in the area, so that later migrants have to either buy or rent the space for putting up their shanties.<sup>9</sup> In administrative terms such colonies are described as “unauthorized colonies”, but these colonies are always engaged in getting a recognized status from the local government. The state of affairs from the point of view of the residents might be described as that of a temporary permanence since many residents have lived in these areas for close to forty years but are still engaged in struggles to get some assurance of permanence.<sup>10</sup> In her astute analysis of urban governance in Mumbai, Julia Eckert (2006) calls attention to eclectic and pragmatic ways in which urban governance takes place and calls such form of governance, after Benda-Beckman (1992), “unnamed law”. She argues that these unnamed laws do not refer to the specific basis of legitimacy but are produced in the interactions “within regimes of governance”. I feel that stepping outside the overdetermined dualism of law and custom is a brilliant move on the part of Eckert, though I hope to extend her argument by showing that underlying these interactions there are claims that derive from diffused notions about preserving life that bind residents of unrecognized slums and of squatter colonies, on the one hand, and the State on the other. For the State, the recourse to juridical notions as embedded in such constitutional notions as right to life, becomes necessary to justify its actions especially when it sets aside the letter of the law in favour of other notions derived from the imperative to preserve the life of the individuals and the community.

Although always vulnerable to vagaries of law and police action, the residents of the jhuggi settlement have acquired some legal protection. The decade of the eighties saw various court decisions that held that the Constitutional right to life was not limited to the right to not be deprived of life without due process – it included the obligation of the State to provide the means for pursuing livelihoods. In different class actions the High Courts in Mumbai, Delhi and Gujarat (among others) held that people who could show residence for a sufficiently long time in one place, as pavement dwellers or as jhuggi dwellers, could not be removed without provision of alternate housing. The law does not always speak with one voice – recently the courts have hedged some of the earlier decisions with various qualifications. The Nawab Khan case adjudicated by the Supreme Court in 1997 clearly stated that the State had the constitutional duty to provide shelter in order to make the right to life meaningful.<sup>11</sup> In addition to court judgments, various administrative decisions regarding city planning also impinged on various localities in different ways in metropolitan areas. As Roma Chatterji (2005) has noted, new administrative proclamations are simply added to earlier ones so that there is a maze of regulations, some of which might very well contradict each other. In NOIDA itself there have been whole clusters of shanties that have been demolished in the last ten years or have been razed to the ground by unexplained fires. Escalating conflicts with property developers or “law and order” problems resulting in interventions by the local police who decided to clean up a cluster of jhuggis resulted in many residents of such clusters having to flee to other places in the late nineties. There are other cases, however, in which the jhuggi dwellers have been able to keep a tenuous hold over their dwellings. It is only by paying close attention to the manner in which the “big” and “small” processes are increasingly enmeshed that we can find a way to understanding some of the issues under discussion. Whereas once it was considered axiomatic that demands of theory required one to extract oneself from irregular details encountered at the so-called micro levels and to view vast landscapes panoramically, new forms of theorizing have vastly complicated our understanding of scale.<sup>12</sup>

In the cluster of about 350 jhuggis in the area that is under consideration here, it was the negotiating skill of the local Pradhan (caste leader) that helped in keeping local conflicts at bay and ensuring that residents could evade eviction or demolition of their jhuggis. The situation changed considerably after the death of this Pradhan in 2006, both due to changes in State level politics and because of a proliferation of new leaders in the locality. I will try to show that the strategies the Pradhan used in collaboration with others, the alliances he built, and the particular vocabulary he used in describing these maneuvers help us to understand not only how precarious the everyday life of jhuggi dwellers is, but also how everyday life itself provides the ground on which citizenship claims can be addressed to the law. At the same time, the forces unleashed after the death of the Pradhan are evidence of the fragility of the strategies that are available to the poor which might easily flip to reveal how contingent are claims to success in this kind of local environment. At one level this story is indeed evidence of what de Certeau (1984) and James Scott (1985) see as the predominant feature of everyday life – viz., that it retraces the very marks left by the power of institutions in the mode of tactical resistance. There is, however, more to the story as law and administrative procedures themselves come to make slow shifts in the face of some commitment to respond to the needs to preserve life – both biological life and the life of the community. Yet, the commitment is always precarious. Let me now return to the story of the Pradhan, Nathu Ram, with which we started.

The Local Tangle of Conflicts

Nathu Ram rose to a position of power in the locality some time in the mid-seventies due to his ability, he said, to deal with outsiders, especially the agents of the State such as policemen. In this aspect he was somewhat like the big men, first made famous by Godelier and Strathern (1991), since he did not represent traditional authority having displaced the earlier caste Pradhan who was not able to deal with outside authorities. Though not a traditional caste Pradhan, Nathu Ram used his dense kinship connections in the area to build support. He counted eight families of close relatives who lived within the same cluster of jhuggis and as his power grew, he encouraged other more distant relatives to come and settle in an adjacent park on kabza land.

Fast forward to the nineteen eighties when the residents of the area were embroiled in conflict with the neighboring Gujjar community – the original residents of the area before it was claimed for industrial development.<sup>13</sup> For the Gujjars (whose fortunes over the years have changed radically as they too have taken advantage of the growth of industry in this area), the presence of a lower caste cluster of jhuggis in the neighborhood was seen as threatening their economic dominance. They feared that these jhuggi dwellers would “corrupt” their young people.<sup>14</sup> Nathu Ram explained to me that most men in the jhuggis were performing the tasks of sweepers or working as load carriers for the local factories that had been coming up since the late seventies. These were not jobs that the Gujjars would have performed, but as long-time settlers in this area, they did not want new settlements to come up. The Gujjars had clout with the police so the police was all set to demolish their jhuggis. In Nathu Ram’s words, “the bulldozers were literally on our threshold.”

'Someone' advised Nathu Ram that he should try to get a court order to stall the demolitions. The lack of specificity in Nathu Ram's account of who that someone was, or how he came to know him, is a typical feature of narratives among the urban poor I have encountered, and it indexes the fact of diffused forms of knowledge over which no one ever has full control but which, like a gambler's luck, can pay dividends. Having gathered this bit of advice, Nathu Ram decided to go to the High Court in the city of Allahabad, though he did not know anyone there. In his own account, he would go to the High Court with a bag of roasted chana (chickpeas) and sit on the stairs munching them, hoping that someone would take notice of him. I should note that such a strategy for getting the attention of State officials, of doctors, of teachers, though not routine, is not uncommon.<sup>15</sup> As luck would have it, an activist lawyer saw him sitting there everyday and asked him what he wanted. Nathu Ram explained his predicament and the lawyer agreed to file a petition for a stay order on the ground that the residents belonged to the scheduled caste category, were economically poor and hence should not be deprived of their homes and their means of livelihood.<sup>16</sup> The lawyer, however, insisted that the jhuggi dwellers legally register themselves as a Society under the U.P. Registration of Societies Act. The jhuggi residents thus acquired the legal status of a Registered Society calling themselves the Harijan Workers Society for Social Struggle (Harijan Mazdur Sangharsh Sabha).<sup>17</sup> They were successful in obtaining a stay order from the court and used it in bargaining with the police. Simultaneously they tried to pursue the demand for alternative accommodation with various political parties, especially before elections, organizing public meetings, holding demonstrations and submitting petitions to various political leaders. Despite promises made every five years during elections, no concrete results by way of getting alternate secure rights over housing came from these endeavors. After Nathu Ram's death a variety of new leaders emerged, some from his own kinship group and others from different regional identities (e.g., one a migrant from Bihar and another from Madhya Pradesh who does not even live in the cluster). One can see that the intensity of party politics at the State level is now reflected in the locality, which has chapters of the major regional parties: the Bahujan Samaj Party – which explicitly identifies itself with the cause of the Dalits (an appellation that till recently the residents actively rejected in favor of the State defined category of Scheduled Caste), the Lok Dal – that seeks to represent known middle castes such as the Jats, and the Samajwadi Party – which was dominant till 2007 but whose fortunes are now on the decline.

It would be evident from the above description that the matter of securing rights over their residence did not end for the jhuggi dwellers with obtaining the stay order. It is true that this protected them from demolition but it did not ensure that they be provided alternative plots of land with permanent rights, which is their goal. Rather, the jhuggi dwellers have continued to find a variety of ways in which they can deepen their claims over housing. Just as the jhuggis are built incrementally – you first occupy a bit of land, you then put up thatched mud walls and a tin roof, and then as more money comes into the house and the family grows, you put up one cement wall, or you put a door or build a room on the roof – similarly, credentials for rights are built incrementally. The legal notion that you either have rights or you do not, would make no sense within these strategies of creating rights. As many people here say, you try first to get one foot in the obscure realms of the government, then the whole body can be inserted referring to the popular folk tale in which a camel manages to displace the tent owner by incrementally occupying the tent. One way to track this phenomenon of creating incremental rights is to think of what dwelling, as distinct from building, entails in ethnographic terms. Perhaps we can shift our gaze from rules and regulations to actual material objects such as electricity meters, water taps and ration cards that become material embodiments of the rights to dwelling. Let me take up each of these objects in turn.

The Agency of Objects

As an unauthorized colony, the jhuggi cluster cannot claim either electricity or drinking water as a matter of civic rights. However, two opposite considerations have led the Water Board and the Electricity Board to grant some de facto rights to the residents in this regard. As far as the Water Board is concerned, the residents still do not have running water, but, because of the fear of cholera epidemics that plague Delhi and its adjoining areas every summer, there is a communal tap that gets potable water. At the height of summer when water supplies dwindle all over the city, residents are supplied with water tanks, which the Pradhan claimed was a result of his political connections. This solved the problem of drinking water somewhat, but did not create any documents such as water bills that could be used as proof of residence.

The story of electricity is quite different. Unlike water, which can be treated as a public good because of health externalities, electricity is not considered a public good. As an unauthorized colony the residents do not have any claims over electricity. Nevertheless all households use electricity. I cannot put precise dates on when houses began to get electricity but the sequence of events is quite clear. Initially some people began to draw electricity from the street pole but no one remembers who were the first households to do so.<sup>18</sup> During the precarious period between 1985 to 1986, that I described earlier, the Pradhan had suggested that if the residents were to apply for regular electricity connections and get electric meters installed, it could become proof of residence. At the same time various government agencies were propagating a drive to get people to pay for the water and the electricity that they used.<sup>19</sup> Thus some houses were able to get electricity meters installed, and could show the bills they had accumulated. Other households hesitated because of the costs. As a result the households are varied in the sources of electricity they use. Some continue to draw electricity from the electric poles in the street while others receive electricity legally and pay for it. Still others have arrived at a complex way of sharing arrangements. Since 2005, many households that use electricity have acquired TV sets or coolers for the summer and have accumulated large amounts in unpaid bills. Even in 2005, there was anxiety expressed by the Pradhan that several people had not paid their electric bills and that this might provide an excuse to the police to enter the settlement and that might upset the fragile understanding that had been reached between the police and the residents to leave them alone.

Important as electricity and water are, perhaps the most important document for the poor is the ration card because it not only enables them to get various food items at subsidized rates but also serves as an identity card for purposes of being able to claim entitlements over various government schemes for welfare. The ration cards are colour-coded. Red cards are issued to those who are below the poverty line, whose per capita income is less than one dollar a day. Next in importance are yellow cards given to those who are defined as vulnerable groups but are not below the poverty line. They are entitled to subsidized food items but at higher rates while all other citizens can get white ration cards that entitle them to buy food items from designated ration shops at prices fixed by the government. The most important function of ration cards, though, is as identity cards and they have to be shown for everything – from getting a child admitted in a neighbourhood school to establishing proof of residence.

The government undertakes periodic drives to verify the ration cards of all recipients in order to update the statistics on people living below the poverty line. In 2004, a survey was to be conducted in the area and the Pradhan persuaded everyone to contribute money towards regularizing ration cards of all families. He is said to have arrived at an “arrangement” (probably a euphemism for a bribe) with the local municipal office by which all earlier ration cards including any forgeries were to be turned in and fresh cards were to be issued. He thought he would be able to get everyone a ration card that was of the appropriate colour but due to some confusion people ended up with either yellow or white cards. When I examined the cards, I found to my surprise that the date of issue is stamped on the bottom of the card while next to name and photograph of the person, the text in Hindi says, “This is not recognized as a ration card” – “Yeh rashan card ke roop mein manya nahin hai”. Instead, it is a document that establishes a right (pradhikaran patra). What is more, the card also states that period of validity of the card is three months. Yet, the record of transactions stamped on the card shows that people have been using it since 2004. Here, then, is an interesting paradox. The jhuggis are built on land that was “occupied” as the term kabza states – yet, this term comes to have legal recognition. Further, ration cards are issued that recognize the jhuggi dwellers as legal subjects while also undoing the claims of the State as being the upholder of law, since it issues a document that it itself proclaims to have no legal validity.

How is one to understand the fact that the State undoes its own legal standing in the most quotidian of manners? I claim that in setting aside the letter of the law in favor of a commitment to preserve life, the State is claiming its legitimacy by recourse to its ability to declare exceptions. Yet, there is a different notion of life that is operative here than what we find in Foucault’s or Agamben's idea of bio-power and bare life respectively, as I argued earlier. "Life" in this context is not only that which is managed by the State – for, in that case, people in categories of illegal residents or migrants would simply fall on the side of "letting die" in Foucault's (2003) terms. Nor do they fall into the category of those who represent bare life that can be taken at will – the idea of biological life is involved but not to the complete exclusion of other aspects such as the recognition that life can only be lived in a community, as witnessed in the administrative actions to give the entire community ration cards, or access to potable water.

In Indian bureaucratic parlance the kind of documents that are given for short durations are known as "emergency measures". This applies to passports and other temporary documents to establish rights of one kind or another for limited periods of time. But what is the notion of an emergency that is at play here? I have listened to the transcripts of my free flowing interviews with the Pradhan Nathu Ram several times, and I also studied the notes of various casual meetings with particular attention to the vocabulary he used. On one side his language was replete with words that were like tracks left by his interactions with various State institutions that show how law impinged into the lives of the residents. Thus, there are words such as - police, court, judge, police-station, hawaldar, officer, bull-dozer, Harijan society, registration (panjikaran), verification (satyapan). Along with these terms, though, there are others that have both legal and ritual meanings. Thus, peshi refers to both the state of possession by a hostile spirit and being summoned to court or to the office of a bureaucrat; sunvai pertains to a hearing in courts as well as the ritual of exorcism. In addition, such expressions as "kuch khilana pada" (something had to be fed) is used as an expression for bribes to officers as well as to hostile spirits; "zuban pe koi hasti aa gayi" (a being came over my tongue), refers to how one might have become eloquent in court or in the presence of an officer overcoming the normal nervousness when confronted with the law as well as to ritual speech under possession.<sup>20</sup> Such mutual contamination of ritual and legal vocabulary tends to show that the manner in which one becomes a legal subject is never on the precise picture of how law imagines the making of such subjects. Such subject positions are sometimes haunted, sometimes animated by one's place within forms of life that certainly go deeper than what either the instrumentalist or the constitutive views of law suggest.

I am not making the case that the enormous coercive powers of law are completely tamed by other competing notions drawn from the flow of life, but I am suggesting that if we are to look at the everyday as the site on which we can track the movements of the State, of performance of citizenship, of constitutive powers of law, then the everyday cannot be treated as simply the secure site of routines and habits as Marcus (1995) suggests. Rather, it is the space on which we can see how underlying these routines and habits, there is a struggle to bring about a newness in which we can track the workings of the law for better and for worse. The story till now has tended toward a limited success; let me now turn to the perils that the NOIDA residents have faced since the death of the Pradhan.

I give a brief account of events in the last four years since the death of the Pradhan, though I will have to reserve a more detailed discussion of the sprawling networks of people and affects for another occasion. New forms of politics have come to be inserted within the structure of anticipation that was created as the people here began to expect that they would eventually succeed in not only saving their places of residence from demolition but would also be able to secure better housing from the State. After Nathu Ram's death, one of his nephews claimed the leadership of the Welfare Association he had founded but despite the stay order obtained from the court, the promise of better housing was still unrealized. Meanwhile the nephew's political career was cut short because of a criminal complaint filed against him by a rival group resulting in his having to flee from the area to avoid arrest. In the last few years the politics around housing has become a major issue in State level politics, marked by bitter rivalries between the Samajwadi Party of Mulayam Singh Yadav and the Bahujan Samaj Party of Mayawati. It might be recalled that the Pradhans of different settlements in NOIDA had begun to organize themselves in Nathu Ram's time by holding joint meetings and trying to negotiate the issue of alternate allotment of housing with various political parties especially at the time of elections. By the time the State Assembly Elections of 2007 took place, the number of registered societies each claiming to represent the residents of various shanty settlements in Noida had risen to twenty-three, each with alliances to local factions of different political parties.

The Registered Society formed by Nathu Ram (Harijan Workers Society for Social Struggle) had become defunct in 2001, having failed to meet certain procedural requirements. Nathu Ram's nephew (the one who was to abscond later) had helped in registering it under another name – Jhuggi Jhopdi Welfare Association in 2001, and in 2006, its membership was renewed by the nephew's son (Vinod) who had now risen to a position of some power. Under the auspices of this Society, there was a writ petition filed in court submitting the names of 1,440 jhuggi households as eligible for allotment of alternate housing. The High Court found merit in the petition and ordered the NOIDA administration to provide alternate accommodations to these households on the payment of Rs.62,000, to be paid in monthly installments of Rs.120 per household. The lawyers of the Society contested this decision on the grounds that, as a Welfare State, India could not charge such exorbitant sums from the poor. There were other petitions filed on behalf of other registered societies claiming that their members had been left out of the list of those entitled to receive alternate housing.

In Chatterjee's rendering of the politics of the governed (2004), we learn that political society was marked by the emergence of a new type of leadership as well as a new associational politics in the squatter colony he describes in Kolkata:

The ICDS scheme is one example of how the residents of the squatter colony could organize to get themselves identified as a distinct population group that could receive the benefits of governmental programs. ... Having set up the association, the residents now use this collective form to deal with other governmental agencies such as the railways, the police, or municipal authorities, with NGOs offering welfare or developmental services, and with political parties and leaders (p. 56).

For my purposes the expression, "the residents now use this collective form to deal with other governmental agencies," is a black box since we are never told what this "dealing with" means in terms of actual negotiations, and hence, are left vague about the forms of power that governmental instruments produce at the level of the community. I offer two extracts from interviews conducted with the local leaders in my field and one extract from political speeches made during a demonstration at the office of the NOIDA authority.

The first extract is from the interview with Vinod (Nathu Ram's nephew who had filed the successful writ petition) and the President of the Welfare Association I mentioned earlier.<sup>21</sup>

Vinod: ... so we asked K.K. Sharma from the NOIDA authority office that of the list of the 1,440 that was submitted to court – people are filling out the forms with verified documents – we have already had 350 forms filled, and sent by Registered Post, but we are not receiving the acknowledgements... he said that we will open a counter right here in the office that can be manned by you – you can collect all forms that people fill out everyday... the system of sending forms by registered post is to be discontinued.

Q. You were saying that you gave a list of 1,440 members of your Society (meaning Registered Society) but that the number of claimants is larger?

Vinod: ... till the survey of sector 9 and 10 is completed and verification of documents is completed, how can we definitively say how many people will make claims?

Q. You had once told (us) that there were 11 people to whom apartments were allocated in a different locality. What was that about?

Vinod: Not eleven, twenty three – that was Amar Singh (political leader from the Samajwadi Party) who authorized this allocation. But the names of the persons to whom this allocation was made were not in the original list.

Shiv Kumar (an associate of Vinod): Those were the victims of that Nihari atrocity (referring to an infamous serial child murder case from a village adjoining NOIDA).

Vinod (cutting in): There is a lot of politics – there are these twelve to fifteen persons who are against our Society ...

Shiv (interrupting): But the SDM (Subdivisional Magistrate) has nullified their Societies – we are the only ones recognized by law... but the Public (using the English word) gets misled (gumrah ho jati hai).

The second citation is from an interview with an office-bearer of another Registered Society, affiliated to the Communist Party of India (CPI).

Q: ...so this time has the survey been conducted more seriously?

Gangaram: Surveys were commenced many times but they were never completed ... basically the netalog (leaders, big men) were asked to give the number of jhuggi owners – someone gave 1,440, someone gave 4,000, someone gave 8,000 ...

Q: And this time?

Gangeshwar: This time was more serious – at least surveyors came and put numbers on the jhuggis – videographs (using word in English) were done – at least they saw what the jhuggis look like.

The third extract is from a speech delivered during a demonstration at the office of the NOIDA Authority.

Speaker (A local leader): You will have to come to your senses! Inqalab zindabad – Long live the Revolution! Stop this Performance (tamasha)! Stop this brokering! Stop exploiting us! Chairman, Come to your senses!

(Everyone is waiting for a more influential leader to arrive and address them. Meanwhile people waiting in the crowd get into conversation with each other).

One of the men: Here everyday there is exploitation – sometimes in the name of survey for plots – another time for ration cards – the so-called leaders charge Rs.500 for filling forms – our demand is stop this brokering (dalali) – the officials are making money from the leaders and the leaders from the people.

Someone else addressing the assembled people exhorts everyone to sit – for women to settle on one side – slogans are raised intermittently but the leader does not arrive – the crowd begins to disperse after two hours.

A full linguistic analysis of the interviews and the public performances cannot be attempted here but I note the following points. First, the vocabulary of Registered Society, corruption, dalali (brokerage), dharna, pradarshana (demonstration), public, etc., is a political vocabulary honed out of actual engagement with processes of governmentality. Second, a local genealogy of events – stay order, writ petition, surveys, allotments, elections – creates a collective, though contested, memory that is locality specific but that bears the traces of various court decisions on the rights of slum-dwellers as well as regional political events.

We might summarize the situation in the jhuggis, which continues to be in a flux, as follows. The High Court instructed the NOIDA authority to conduct an authoritative survey to submit a final list of jhuggi dwellers in all sectors of NOIDA with a view to providing them with alternate housing in 2008. Various registered societies sprung up and started to conduct their own surveys, often charging residents anything from Rs.500 to Rs.3,000 as a condition of their names being included in the authoritative list. After the electoral victory of the Bahujan Samaj Party in the Assembly Elections of 2007, the Dalit leader Mayawati was sworn in as Chief Minister of the State. While there was great hope that as a Dalit she would expedite the allotment of houses to the jhuggi dwellers who are predominantly from her own caste, what has happened is that more surveys have been ordered; several registered societies have been spawned as some have been derecognized as illegitimate by the administration; and residents of the cluster of households where I have been working have become so enraged by the various brokers who have emerged that they have held demonstrations against these brokers at the office of the NOIDA authority! As one resident of the area summarized the situation for me “Every year we wait for Mayawati to make an announcement on her birthday in January to the effect that we have been given rights over our jhuggis or that all jhuggi dwellers have been given alternate plots. All that happens is that new surveys are announced, new documents have to be produced – the number of those who claim rights over jhuggis has gone up from 1,440 to 10,000 and will keep going up. Meanwhile nothing is going to happen.” Nevertheless I sense a cautious optimism in the simple fact that septic tanks are being installed by a number of households who have got together to make a collective arrangement; a new floor is added here or a room constructed there though precariously perched on the unstable foundation of the house; walls are whitewashed, someone puts tiles on a square outside the jhuggi so that the space in front can be cleaned easily.

Concluding Observations

In following the struggles over housing among the poor I hope to have shown that claims to citizenship are crafted not through or only through formal legal procedures. Instead, it is the actual labour put in by residents of such marginal places as the jhuggi-jhopdi settlements, a labour of learning how to deal with legal spaces of courts and police precincts as well as the labour in securing objects on whose agency they can call on to establish incremental citizenship, that creates new forms in which citizenship can be actualized. One cannot but be moved by the manner in which an underlying allegiance to the idea of preserving life both at the level of the individual and that of the community comes to be expressed in the moments when the State is able to put aside its function to punish infringements of law, thus allowing claims of life to trump claims of law. It is also the case that new forms of politics open up the space for continuous surveillance through governmental tactics such as surveys or renewed procedures of verification of documents, though on a model that is almost a parody of Foucault’s model of surveillance since what it generates is the emergence of new forms of brokerage that drain people of their meager resources. The very instruments of surveillance such as surveys and verification of documents provide an opportunity for brokers to emerge from within the community and become a new face of the State. Instead of a panoramic view of State and citizenship through the Hegelian lens of civil society or the Habermasian notion of public sphere<sup>22</sup>, the attention to the minutiae of everyday life allows us to bring into view the complex agencies at play here in the claim to citizenship.

Notes

<sup>1</sup> I am grateful to the residents of the jhuggi colony for sharing stories of their struggles and allowing my research assistants and me to participate in their activities. The staff at ISERDD, Delhi, has been exemplary in the research support they have given. I especially thank Purshottam Kumar for tracking the network of local leaders. This lecture is a revised and expanded version of a seminar first given at the Max Planck Institute, Halle in 2008. My thanks to Julia Eckert, Pratiksha Baxi, Jennifer Culbert, Roma Chatterji and Deepak Mehta, for comments on earlier versions. I offer my gratitude to Vice Chancellor Shyam Menon, and the faculty and students of Ambedkar University, Delhi, for inviting me to deliver the second Ambedkar Memorial Lecture and for making the occasion truly memorable for me. I thank Pratap Bhanu Mehta for his astute comments as discussant.

<sup>2</sup> I arrive at this constellation of meanings of the term haq not by following its dictionary meanings according to which haq (a term found in Arabic, Persian, Hebrew and Urdu) means both justice and truth, but through following its everyday use. While I cannot elaborate on the ethnography of its use here for reasons of space, the term was evoked primarily in the sense of “standing” – as in having the standing to both give and receive. Thus, for instance, an elder sister might insist that she had acquired the haq to give gifts to a brother on his marriage while parents might insist that a girl only has the haq to receive from her natal family, never to give. On the other hand such statements as, “I am only asking for my haq”, evoke the notion of justice while a police officer asking for bribe by saying he is demanding his haq is extending the idea of standing, and not of justice. My argument, however, rests less on expanding on the discursive contexts of the term and more on showing the complex field of legal and political action through which notions of citizenship were actualised.

<sup>3</sup> To take a compelling example, “... while I complain of being able to glimpse no more than the shadow of the past, I may be insensitive to reality as it is taking shape at this very moment...” (Lèvi-Strauss 1974: 43).

<sup>4</sup> The other source for understanding the nature of the rule is the corpus of texts on sacrifice since this is a major concern in the interpretation of Vedic injunctions (mimamsa). The rules of interpretation formulated in these texts are also used to interpret legal rules.

<sup>5</sup> Since this form of sexual transgression is considered as grave as an incestuous relation with the mother, even though the guru's wife is not the biological mother but the wife of the person who fathers you into your place in the world, it nicely captures the notion of life as absorbing both the social and the natural and thus going beyond each in itself.

<sup>6</sup> The Sanskrit term that Buhler translates as substitute is pratinidhi which could also be translated as “representative” – thus the performance of an abbreviated ritual can “represent” the more elaborate ritual.

<sup>7</sup> See Bruno Latour's (2010) masterful exposition of the manner in which such projects within the law as ripening the file, or binding the enunciation to the enunciator, as well as rhetoric techniques of detachment produce the effect of following a rule within the legal protocols he describes. My difference with Latour is in his understanding of law as strictly that which happens within administrative law since it is here that for him, facts can be made to disappear and the realm of pure law can be brought into view. A constitutive view of law would assume that law folds into both forms of governmentality and within subjects made through the interpenetration of the judicial and the governmental techniques, which then come to define legal subjects even when they are not present in court.

<sup>8</sup> The term jhuggi-jhopdi colony is an administrative term referring to shanties located over land that has been occupied and over which no formal rights exist. This term is to be distinguished from official slums.

<sup>9</sup> I want to emphasize that local histories of neighbourhoods in Delhi are varied. Some neighbourhoods came up because people were allocated land in exchange for participation in various government schemes. The most notorious example was that of allocation of house plots in the beautification cum sterilization drive during the National Emergency of 1976 in Delhi. See Emma Tarlo (2003).

<sup>10</sup> In the case of Mumbai, the drive to clean slums, especially Dharavi, has led to fascinating local level movements supported by NGOs, international donors and even state bureaucracies pressing for creation of permanent rights over land to slum dwellers. In part this was due to the increasing value of land and the desire to convert occupied land parcels into commodities that would be securely transacted. However, market considerations are not the only ones that have led to struggles over housing for the poor. See Arjun Appadurai (2001) and Roma Chatterji (2005).

<sup>11</sup> Significant cases with regard to the right to be provided alternate housing if one can show continuous dwelling by pavement dwellers and other vulnerable groups are the following: Olga Tellis vs. Bombay Municipal Corporation 1985 (3) SSC 545 adjudicated in the Bombay High Court and then went up to the Supreme Court in which Justice Chandrachud held that the destruction of a dwelling house is the destruction of all that one holds dear in life. Thus the Court while upholding the Bombay Municipal Corporation's act of clearing pavements of illegal occupiers, nevertheless held that they could only be evicted after they had been provided with alternate housing. This judgment was expanded in the 1990s in the Chameli Singh vs. State of U.P. and Ahmedabad Municipal Corporation vs. Nawab Khan Gulab Khan. See the excellent summary of the cases by Jayna Kothari (2002).

<sup>12</sup> This is an important methodological point that I simply wish to flag here to block off the criticism that such examples of community level politics do not help in telling the large story as also to argue that spatial notions of State create the impression of the State as a container within which smaller communities are enclosed. Instead, my argument is that the presence of the State is also discerned in the texture of relations. See Thrift (1999), Das (2007) and for the classic formulation on the significance of so-called small things see Tarde (1999).

<sup>13</sup> Though classified as a “backward” community now belonging to the administrative category of “Other Backward Castes”, historians identify several past kingdoms as Gujjar or Gurjara in origin.

<sup>14</sup> Observations based on interview with a local Gujjar leader in 2002 and frequent interactions with another upper caste medical practitioner who does not have a formal degree in medicine but wields considerable influence due to his ability to give high risk, high interest loans to the jhuggi dwellers.

<sup>15</sup> I think that this form of supplication draws from the implicit idea of patron-client relations, which otherwise the migrant lower castes are vociferous in rejecting.

<sup>16</sup> As I noted earlier, the decade of the eighties was a period of some landmark cases in which rights of pavement dwellers and hawkers to their place of habitation, even if illegally occupied, were strongly protected by various High Courts of the country.

<sup>17</sup> The name of the Society bears trace of the intervention of the upper caste lawyer who might have suggested the name. Harijan was the term Gandhi used for untouchables but later Dalit leaders rejected this appellation. Of the twenty-three or so registered societies that are now active in the local politics of the area, none uses caste terms – preferring such titles as Jhuggi-Jhopdi Welfare Association, Society for Worker’s Struggle etc.

<sup>18</sup> It is important to mention that electricity has not been privatized in U.P. Thus, the jhuggi dwellers interact with government officials over electricity claims and not with private companies. However, private arrangements such as getting lines from street poles by paying a “regular fee” to the local official, or sharing the electricity provided to a neighbour are common.

<sup>19</sup> Though electricity was privatized in adjoining Delhi, in the case of NOIDA the supply comes from a public sector undertaking.

<sup>20</sup> For a more detailed discussion of the use of such ritual cum legal vocabulary in exorcism rituals see Das (2008).

<sup>21</sup> There were three of us when this interview was conducted. References to earlier conversations are not to any formal interviews but to conversations between Vinod, Purshottam and me during routine visits to the community.

<sup>22</sup> See, for instance, Bhargava and Reifeld (2005) for the variety of ways in which citizenship comes to be discussed through these overarching concepts which, however, leave the lives of the poor outside the purview of these discussions.
